3.1

According to research presented by Nick Stewart, a psychologist from Oxford Brookes University, singing in a choir may be good for our mental health. Stewart analysed responses from 375 people who sang in choirs, sang alone or who played a team sport. His analysis showed that all the three activities have a positive effect on an individual's well-being.

3.2

The analysis showed that singing in a choir, where you get together with other people, is much better for your well-being than singing alone. Also, it has long been known that joining a sports team is good for both our physical and our mental health. Surprisingly, however, people regard singing in a choir to be a more positive experience than being in a sports team.

3.3

Nick Stewart explains that we still know little about the actual effects that singing in a choir has on people. He suggests that the experience of making music may be more positive when the singer is a member of a social group. He also says it would be worth studying what effects moving and breathing in harmony with other people has on the individual.
